Alongside dementia and Alzheimer’s disease, Parkinson’s is one of the most common disorders of the central nervous system. Approximately 166,000 people in UK are affected.

When the body no longer responds as it should due to changes in the central nervous system, people with Parkinson’s tend to adopt avoidance strategies and often choose isolation out of a sense of shame. Simple movements, such as holding a knife and fork, can no longer be managed alone.

Helplessness overshadows enjoyment and pleasure. Relatives often try to take as much as possible off the patient’s hands and assist with tasks large and small – starting with spreading butter on bread. Yet it is precisely activities of daily living, such as personal hygiene and food preparation, that should be practised for as long as possible.

The colourful ORNAMIN tableware, with its hidden features, helps maintain and promote independence and enjoyment at the dining table. With the support of speech therapists, occupational therapists and physiotherapists, people living with Parkinson’s disease can retain a sense of joy in life – despite limited coordination and fine motor skills.
